

7/20/16 - Arthur Murray of Danbury

The Arthur Murray studio in Danbury is not your typical dance studio; it's a home for learning, inspiration and overall, it's a place to have fun. Nicole Almeida has provided this franchise with a judgement-free dancing environment and a family-like atmosphere amongst students and teachers. Nicole is a second-generation owner of our Danbury studio, following in her parents' footsteps. She was ranked as the third best dance teacher in the world in 2006 and Danbury is certainly proud to have her!

Each new student is evaluated based on their learning style and personality to determine the most beneficial curriculum. A typical dancer follows a three-tier learning process of personal lessons, group sessions and dedicated practice times. Some people come to the studio with no knowledge of dance, but the willingness to challenge themselves. All of your lessons are developed to fit your specific needs and goals, which is why there isn't one set curriculum.

At this studio, you do not need a partner to start dancing. There are plenty of vibrant instructors that will guide you on your journey. There are a multitude of classic dances to study, but Arthur Murray also offers a unique teaching of "social dance survival skills." You can come in wanting to learn how to dance at a party or at a wedding and the instructors will help you. They even go to Molly Darcy's regularly to practice their dancing in public.

After a recent renovation, the Arthur Murray studio is now one large ballroom, allowing many lessons to happen at once and making it easier for dancers to travel. This also is a partial reason why Arthur Murray can be so flexible with your schedule.

Nicole wants people to turn to dancing as a way to connect with others because she sees dancing as a more personal way to socialize than most of today's forms of interaction.

Some of the dancers from this studio go on to compete at Arthur Murray competitions which are held all over the world. Or you can move up in levels in the studio in Danbury to earn certificates.

Arthur Murray is located at 345 Main Street. Call today to sign up for your first lesson! 203-792-0176
